Crisis intervention: turning constraints in opportunities for change
The practice and science of mental disorders at the frontier of emergency room and acute treatment

Dear Colleagues, Chers amis,

Over the last few years, a growing need for psychiatric emergency care has been successfully responded in terms of service innovation and increased interdisciplinary integration. How to manage valuable transition from emergency intervention to well structured acute treatment still is, however, an almost neglected issue. This is a field of enormous need and tremendous potential for treatment improvement, research progress and health economics. On a changing medical scene, a new acute mental patient and his/her emotional crisis challenge contemporary psychiatry to develop more efficient mental health policies considering both the unique psychobiological vulnerability a given patient and population data. To further discuss these issues, we are pleased to invite you to participate into the 7th IAEP meeting that will be held in Geneva February 2-6, 2009. The main themes are presented in the front page. The conference will provide a great opportunity to report a variety of studies, clinical accounts and service research data, both in French and in English. Simultaneous translation will allow to compare a number of international points of view as well as to facilitate the active participation of a clinical audience.

Welcome to Geneva!
